The Book That Zealous Reformers Once Burned in Public

At Last!

Censorship No Longer Denies You This Thrill of Thrills—

Tales from THE GREAT DECAMERON...

YOU'LL never know life until you've read this greatest of all forbidden books! You'll never know how utterly stark and vivid a picture of human passions can be painted in words until you've feasted on the most fascinating tales from the greatest of all true-to-life books—the immortal Decameron of Boccaccio!

Between its pages, the thrill of a lifetime of reading awaits you. Before your very eyes is unfolded the glittering pageantry of a golden age now vanished, an age when passion, intrigue and high-riding romance held full sway. Past you, in a breath-taking parade, sweep some of the most beautiful, yet unprincipled, women of all time—women whose intense fascination fired men's blood and even altered the fates of empires. Here you will find tales of great love, when a woman would drink of life and love to its very dregs!

Few writers have ever dared to write so truthfully of the frailties to which the flesh is heir. But the flaming pen of Giovanni Boccaccio knew no restraint. Sope-lativated, and fearless to the ultimate degree, his stories are not only brilliant fiction of the most gripping variety—but also the most illuminating record of life in fourteenth-century Italy ever penned. Hardly a detail of the e stirring times escaped his ever-watchful eye—and what he saw, he wrote, without hesitation or fear.

Mystery No Longer Shrouds This Brilliant Masterpiece

Perhaps no other book ever written has had such an amazing history. Written in so vigorous a style as to be actually startling, it has long been a storm center of fierce controversy and even persecution. Critics and the haute-monde have acclaimed it with untainted praise for its sparkling vividness and subject matter—while prudish reformers, aghast at the utter frankness with which Boccaccio exposed human life and love in the raw, resorted to every possible means to keep this masterpiece from general circulation. At one time they actually went so far as to gather all the available copies and have them publicly burned!

But all that was yesterday. To-day the thrill that awaits the reader within the glowing pages of Decameron Tales is no longer denied you. This is the age of reason—and the peerless word-artistry of genial old Boccaccio has come into its own at last!

Now, for a short time only, you can inspect these great examples of realistic writing in your own home for five days, without obligation!

A Literary Treasure-House

Rich in fascinating plot, tense with action and vibrant with human passion—the Decameron has furnished plots for the world's great masters of literature. Longfellow, Keats, Dryden, Chaucer, and even the great Shakespeare himself sought these immortal pages for inspiration. In no other volume are the morals and customs of Italy of the fourteenth century so graphically laid before you—the way people lived, the hotels and palaces they dwelt in, the fantastic pleasures they indulged in—all are told with both wit and pathos that are irresistible. Thus the stories not only amuse and entertain, but constitute a landmark of literature which must not be passed over if you would broaden your vision—make yourself truly cultured.

The Latest and completest BOOK of SEX KNOWLEDGE

BY A DOCTOR OF SCIENCE (PHYSIOLOGY)

IGNORANCE of the facts of life is to blame for the majority of human tragedies. This is now acknowledged to be true by all sincere people. Sex and all the problems surrounding it have been shrouded in the darkness of superstition and mystery. In "A Complete Book of Sex Knowledge" there is not a single side of the sex problem, and its application to every stage of human life that has not been fully treated. You cannot afford to be without this book, and no description of it can possibly convey to you its extraordinary value. It tells in non-technical language those things that worry people most.

TWO DEVILS FOR DEVLIN

By Robert Leslie Bellem

A WOMAN'S breasts were no novelty to Al Devlin. But these were different. Al had a copra plantation, with a side-line of pearl shells, on the tiny south sea island of Tongalusa and the light-skinned native girls who wore a string of pearls and an amiable expression had become an old story.

"Maybe I'm dead!" Al said, tearing his eyes away from the smooth white breasts and permitting his gaze to travel upward.

The girl who was leaning over him smiled. She didn't seem to realize how low her dress was cut in the neck. She was dressed in crisp white. She had reddish-gold hair; her eyes had an amber tint; her nose was just the right bit tip-tilted, and her mouth was kind and smiling. Here and there a stray freckle intruded itself.

"No, you're not fit to be seen. You're in the hospital at Port Wyke. And you're not to talk!" the red-haired doctor said.

"Port Wyke?" Al said wonderingly. "Why, Port Wyke was severely decimated from Tongareva, the better part of a day's journey in a launch!" "Is her about the place, too?" he persisted.

"What? Concerning you are supposed to be kept quiet."

Al persisted. Then he grinned a little. "Where did Paul Correll bring his charms down here to act as charms?"

The girl at white blushed. "No matter how fit you must live up to your reputation, mustn't you?"

"Have I a reputation?" Al said in surprise.

"All over the island. You're a lady-killer. But you can't work your charms on me. I'm strictly business, and you're just another case."

"How long have I been here and how did I get here?" he persisted.

"You've been here a week, dead to the world, and a fat native chief brought you."

"Old Illyha?"

She nodded. "I think that's what it was."

Al smiled. "I thought the old "Highness had run off. I misjudged him! Now, what a scrap that was! The last thing I remember was being bound out the door, and jumping into the lagoon."

"It's a wonder you weren't killed. You have a hard head."

"And a soft heart. At last, every time I look at you my heart gets softer."

"You're still delirious! Now go to sleep."

"I'll only dream about you if I do."

"Well, let that your dreams be moral! And he left him."

At the words of Al thinking contemplation that followed, he came to the conclusion that the bandit was his first friend since he had been in love were but passing phases of delirium. There was no one like Alice Denney, the red-haired nurse.

"That's great," he had said when he learned her name.

"What's great?"

"Your being Alice Denney."

"Why?"

"Because you won't love to change your initials when you marry me. Alice Denney, A. D., and I'm Al Denney, also A. D."

"Who said anything about marrying me?"

"Oh lots of gold! But I would say it all down. I was waiting for you to come along."

You take a lot for granted! She found that passing chat and left him. But he was persistent. The next time she came in he said, "Listen. You've got to marry me."

(then more)

"Why?"

"Well, you know everything about me there is to be known. You've bathed me and changed my clothes and all that sort of thing. You've got to marry me to save my self-respect. You've compromised me!"

She laughed. "If I married every man I've taken care of, I'd be a polyandrist a hundred times over."

"That's a good word. What does it mean?" he teased.

She smiled gaily. "Listen, do you think I'd marry a man with your reputation? Why, you'd two-time me the first chance you got. No, I'm a one-man woman for a one-man man."

He blushed. "Oh, I know I've got a name for that sort of thing. But I'm a changed man now. Won't you give me a chance to prove it to you?"

"Don't you want your Dutch Blossom?" the girl cried as she leaned over him.

"Well," she hesitated. "I'll tell you what: if, after you leave tomorrow, you can prove that you'd be faithful for—a couple of months, I might listen to you."

"That's easy! Just watch me!"

"That's the trouble—I can't watch you! But I tell you what I can do. I'll let you take my house-boy, Cheng, back to Tongalusa with you. He can report to me about you. Would you be willing to do that?"

Which was how Al Deelin came to go back to Tongalusa with a Chinese house-boy and a heart full of resolutions.

The first thing Devlin did when he got back to his island was to clean out his household staff, which consisted of three native girls. One in particular, little Loa-loa, objected strenuously.

"Chinaman can't take place of Loa-loa!" she complained.

"Oh, yes he can! He's a good cook and he knows how to do house-work!"

Loa-loa wiggled indignantly. In view of the fact that her sash was a G-string, the wiggle was very effective. She was a rich gold color, and her form would have posed nicely in any Ziegfeld show. "Chinaman can't do that!" she said seductively.

"Hold tighter now or I'll throw him out on his ear!"

Loa-loa came closer. "Can Chinaman kiss like Loa-loa?" she whispered.

"I don't know. Why don't you try him and see?"

The girl frowned and backed away. "Loa-loa no kiss Chinaman! Loa-loa only kiss Tuan Dev-in!"

"Not any more you don't! I'm a good boy from now on! I'm sorry, Loa, but that's all over. Good-bye and good luck, and here's a box of stamps for you as a parting gift."

I hope you noticed that, Devlin said to Chang.

Me see. Me tell master Dennis. Chang answered.

That same night old Illybo, the slave, dropped in for a look. He was glad to see them. "So you managed to beat Baraga off your lot!" he said as he handed the paper a swirl of air.

"You save Illybo's life. Illybo no forget. Illybo repay. Way and so!"

"But Illybo has repaid already!" Al protested.

"No. Illybo repay. Wait and see!" the old man repeated mysteriously, as he left.

Al Devlin went to bed early. He was tired after the first day back at work. He went to sleep immediately, but soon awoke with the feeling he was not alone.

Al stared. Two native girls, as pretty a pair as he'd ever seen in the islands, young, fresh and absolutely pajamasless, were in his bed, one on each side of him!

"Me Tolu!" "Me Toa-lea!" they said softly.

"What in the devil are you doing here, both of you?"

"We present to you from Illybo. You like us some, master?"

"I don't want you to belong to me! I have other plans!" Devlin said angrily.

"Maybe you like just one of us tonight, eh? You like me way best, he go?" Toa's face was close to him. She pointed at Toa-lea.

"No! Me stay, she go!" Toa-lea said sharply.

LYOBIE slipped from the bed and wriggled her pink and white body. Her nightgown dropped to the floor. It was one p.m., early morning, the Breadline.

The tenant Ireland felt of clanking, she had been wearing when she and Eddie entered the room the night before was heaped upon a chair. She began putting on stockings and stockings before going to the bowl to wash.

Eddie rolled over on the bed and looked at her. He was wide awake.

"Well, honey," he said, "At least we had a beautiful last night together."

"Right, Eddie. You've still got plenty of the old 5 ft. But it's like I told you last night. You can't lead this double any longer, as you know. Eddie and Lyobie Morris have been over the curtain so many times that even changing needles don't help. We're old and so everybody's got eyes on a trouble there. "Well, I didn't finish ridin' you. The Avenue don't's best after me to double the width Ben, and I told her I didn't know yet. But I suppose I can keep her up now. She's got a pretty notion of gettin' her pants bought now, and there's more tips in that kid's jaw than a wood-pecker's got gonna do, and then go down in the lobby and pick somebody up. Say you do it tonight."

"But, look here. . . ."

"What's the matter? That's the way they all do it, ain't it? The guy lets himself get caught, that's all."

"Yeah. But you're kind of rushin' it, ain't you?"

"Well, if it's got to be done—the sooner the better. Ain't that right?"

"Yeah, I suppose so. All right. Say you make it about eleven to-night. I'll get somebody up here, and everything'll be all set. But don't let the dick break in the door cause they may put it on the bill. Just rap loud. I'll open the door."

reputation any harm. She looked, in a word, as though she didn't have any reputation at all worth bothering about.

She was seated on a settee in an alcove, reading a pink-covered tabloid, and smoking. As Eddie sank down at the other end of the divan she put her cigarette on the rim of the ash tray between them. When she reached for it again it had burned away to little more than a cylindrical ash. She withdrew her hand disgustedly.

"Have one of mine," Eddie offered courteously, and extended the pack. She smiled and accepted one. Lyube had given Eddie a lighter for his birthday. It worked for the blonde-by-decision.

"Now, what'll we talk about?" Eddie grinned.

"You begin," she suggested.

After a while she threw away the tabloid and they got confidential. As Lyube remarked in the morning, Eddie had plenty of the old S. A. and very little S-A-P. When they got up to take the elevator the blonde carefully looked

"Come to papa, sweetness. You can't go by-by dressed like that," he said.

Eddie stalked through the lobby that night until he found precisely what he wanted. She was blonde, by decision, and looked quite as though anything that came out in the papers about her wouldn't do her all about.

"You didn't see the house dick anywhere, did you?" he asked Lyube.

"No. But then, I wouldn't know him if I saw him. Come on. It's all right."

"I hate house dicks," said she, as the elevator took them up.

"I don't take many of them to my little round bosom either," replied Eddie.

Her name proved to be Edith, and she was wearing a dress with a plaited skirt, so it didn't take her long to get that off. She said she wanted to preserve the plaits.

Eddie had a bottle of what-all-the shootin's-fer and gave her a drink.

"Where did you get this lic-ker?" she wanted to know.

"What do you want, baby, a pedigree? You ain't buyin' a dog. Look, I'll drink with you to show you it's safe."

They finished the drinks and Eddie looked at his watch. Nine-thirty. And Lyobe and her raiding party weren't due before eleven. Well, no use wasting an hour and a half.

They settled down to finish the bottle, and Eddie started to neck the young lady just to keep himself interested. Shortly before eleven o'clock there was a rap on the door.

"Don't move!" said Eddie.

Edith had sat up at the first sound, and now jumped to her feet. "I'm going," she said, starting to duck out to the fire-escape without a dress, and with her unshocked brassiere flapping around her like water wings.

"Come 'ere!" Eddie exclaimed, dragging her back. She struggled with him but he hung on. All this stalling for nothing? Worthahell!

The rapping became more insis-

"Wanna smoke?" he asked the girl.

tent and demanding.

"Now keep quiet!" Eddie said, and thrust his unwilling guest into a chair. She sat there tense and white-faced a moment, then abruptly relaxed. "Oh, tahell with them," she said. "Give me a cigarette before you open the door."

Eddie tossed her the pack from the table beside the bed, following it with a folder of matches. The door panel seemed ready to split from the pounding it was getting.

Eddie turned the knob and yanked the door open, pulling back his hair sheepishly.

Into the room blew the runty house dick with his stiff hat on the back of his bullet head. Just behind him was Lyobe, wearing a mantle of righteous wrath.

They looked about, both showing a shocked expression. Then the detective gave a yell like a man struck from behind. With a leap he was on top of Eddie and pounding him about the head. Edith screamed. Lydie looked at them as though they were all crazy. Then, seeing Eddie grating the wood of it, and taking right and left with just about every part of him but the arms he had raised in defense, she grabbed the telephone and banged it down with all her might on top of the dial's head. He hit the floor like a sack of wool. Lydie rushed down, put the telephone back on its stand, and hung up the receiver.

(turn over)

"What's the idea?" she demanded of the grinning detective. "I told you to come here to Mr. Morris' room with me and see what there was to me. I didn't tell you to assault him!"

"But you don't get the idea," said the detective, jumping up and staggering Eddie with more rights. "That little blonde is my wife! Take that, Morris, and that, and that!"

In The Swim

Which to put it mildly is suiting the action to the word, according to Grace Chandler's story

YUH can't see the half of it, dearie!

This black eye ain't exactly a royal bull decoration, and I'm still limping some, but it's the collegiate collection of bruises in Harvard Red, Yale Blue and Princeton Orange and Black, to say nothing of Dartmouth Green, what I got parked on them parts of my anatomy not on vlew to the general public that would give yuh more of an idra of the swell time that was had by all.

Where at?

Why at a college PROM! Where else at would yuh expect anybody to come home from looking like they had just recovered from the Bubonic Plague, or been run over by a couple of cheer leaders?

When Micky Marshall gives me the come htdier to promenade myself up to the beer and pretzel festination where he was in for four years I wasn't exactly thrilled to a hat to-male over the idear.

*When she lost her costume, she thought it time
to dive!*

(turn over)

Yuh see, dearie, I'd made a New Year's resolution to lead the pure and simple for a change, and I'm nat one of them low downs what make and break their resolutions the same week.

So I thought I'd ward off my destiny by running double, for awhile anyway, long enough to grease the skids of life with a little alimony. What's that? Yuh say yuh think a Prom would be a good place to pick up the necessary article wearing pants that show? Listen to me, dearie, college men make the grandest sugar papas, but for an honest-to-Gawd-bring-home-the-bacon-daddy oh, I could laugh myself into a state of semicolon.

A Prom, dearie, is a hisslatin' title for a Plumbers' Ball. They've got the same trimmings otherwise. Wine, women, and song are the same old tools of the devil since Eve invented ferment and torment by the simple act of sinking her upper set in a choice Ben Davis, whether you spell 'em that way, or call 'em Gin, Broads and Whoopee!

That's why I turned Mickey's sinful invitation down flatter than a nail hammered in by a woman. I knew only too well that PROMS were not conducted along the lines of a Wednesday night prayer meeting. But he kept urging me for old times sake, me and Mickey discovered our first red kins together, so after saying NO absolutely positively five or six times I gave in as us weak sisters always do to cave man tactics. And, anyways, I figured it wouldn't interfere with my leading the pure life since Mickey's reformed just like me and is studying to be a minister. Think I might have know, dearie, that D. D. can stand for Dirty Devil as well as other things.

But let me spell in your ear, dearie, the awful truth about this Prom.— It'll paralyze you. Though it was conducted under the divine influence of Christianity, so to speak, it was a wow! Their high tide was a Costume Ball, your gentleman friend concocting said costume out of the billboards of his imagination.

Yuh'd be surprised at the single-track minds them ministerial students had. They could have been put in jail for infringing on the copyright of Eve's original little sin. And Gawd knows what Mickey was suffering from when he drew up the specifications for me, water on the knee, maybe. Or else he'd been reading that doggerel of Bill Steppars' for my costume was "nothing much before, and hard as that behind," if yuh can wrap the skirts of your mentality around that, dearie.

Of course I was flattered, any woman would be, to have a man think yuh wear a bra size five number 28 with a couple of tucks what I really have to wear a forty-four—. Never mind, that's nobody's business, not even yours.

When that costume was delivered to my hang-out at the Deacons' Home, I gave Mickey a ring to find out where and why the eighth error of the alphabet they had out sent me a couple of patch pockets of cliff-fun.

"Patch pockets?" yells Mickey getting temperamental.

"That's your costume! You're supposed to be a water-straph!"

So I says, sarcastic like, "Thank Gawd for the water!"

But it didn't punctuate my remark, I mean. Now wouldn't that have socked yuh more bow-legged than yuh are already?

Needless to say it didn't overbook me to get dressed. Just as I was

*"Why turn the spotlight on me?" she whimpered as they dragged her out.
"I'm all lit up already."*

stretching a point in the chaffin Mickey calls me up.

"Be sure to wear the flowers I sent you, Yvonne," he articulates airily. "They're the crowning touch to that costume I designed."

"Well, if I had yuh here I'd put a crowning touch on yuh that yuh'd be an Unknown Soldier even to your own family," I sneers back. "I'm getting a cold in my head already, due to your lack of chivalry, cash and clink. What in Gawd's name will I pin them water lilies to any way?"

"Use your imagination, red head," says Sir Walter Raleigh the Second, as he hangs up on me.

But I didn't have any with me, dearie, and the Heaven what is supposed to protect us poor working girls had thud at noon that day, so after much exerting of the old bean I got a piece of ribbon, tied it round my meridian, stuck that bunch of pink posies inside it, and went 'em

(turn over)

"How was the Prom, dearie?" she asked.

as a boutonniere! Don't look that up, dearie. You'll never get over it.

The hour for the Prom finally rolled around just as I'm getting ready to catch double yummies, and I get another jolt, dearie. There was two Proms, both going off at once and the same time and in the same place. If yeh can deduce the wisdom of that, dearie.

Yeh see how well one of them told marriage college. Men and girls both. And the other was to see if yeh could stand each other at the same table seven evenings a week. Restricted from throwing the table caps at each other's head was considered the same as a publicly announced engagement.

Then came the War of the Social. The rules suddenly went big, kind, turned up their satisfactory noses at the dressy boys and went in for classy importations like me, dearie. Of course that made the local dance madder than ever, so they cut the line list of asking a Prom of their own on the same date and inviting that tricky species "the man back home." There was only the one place to hold both armies so it soon got to be quite a mixed tea party, if yuh can sip the Oolong of that, dearie.

The college ribs had outguessed the boys in providing that which agitates the dogs by having a twenty-piece orchestra composed entirely of mourning saxophones as against the more fifteen blue slakers signed up by Mucker's gang. And when they both played at the same time without the technicality of having the same tune, well, bring on your Hell and Damnation and let's see what they got what's worse!

The two camps was as cheery as a pimato cheese sandwich and a strawberry shortcake in the middle of the night without a soda pop in the house. The girls went out to average their insults and their imulations were as well prepared as they might lose boys if they had taken their married women more seriously.

shockingly bright ideas of his and had had the swimming pool drained, decorated up to the nines with the orchestra hidden behind a clump of bullrushes along the side, dim lights lock as a peach of a place for a peevish intermission.

For after all, dearie, ▶▶▶ Prom without liquidation is like going to a peevish party with a cracked lip. What's the use?

Well, the aforesaid intermission was a bit long, I'll admit, and when we came back our hilarity had increased in tempo per ratio per battle. The first moonlight dance was the next scheduled and Macker had ordered all the lights turned out except for a huge golden moon that resembled the nose of us, being full and a bit wobbly on its post.

The quart began to order everybody to bustle up their aprons. Gawd, maybe I didn't wish large that I had me in button and we plunged back into the whirl of and the rest of the stage settings of a sinful scene.

The effect was a scunner, and more than crashed the real attraction dancing space unless they used the men's lockers, and of course, no self-respecting female would go in such a place without a special invitation. And anyway, Macker and his fellow Reverends were holding those lovelier scenes in reserve under a pad-the dance.

Plunged is right! Right into the swim of things I'll tell a listening world. We were up to our necks in the sudden, vastness taking water overboard with emeralddehyde!

Those hell cats and their up-from-the-farm Even Juans had flooded the pool while we were intermissioning and had aided and abetted the dastardly diet by attaching an extra

The Madame Oversleeps

By Frank Kenneth Young

TRAMPING from England through France may not agree with the popular conception of Summer sport, but Hampson was assured while his lady comfortably lay in "Wonderland" that it had been frequently his last adventure in the game. He had had there —trapping and crawling in a small village, the sort of which is usual here in the country—before that the check for which he had wired had yet to reach him, and he was without funds with which to pay for a night's lodging. The landowner refused to take a chance on an unknown Englishman who might or might not have a check coming from home, but suggested that some kind-hearted individual might be found somewhere in the village. Hampson was grateful.

Strolling toward the outskirts of town, he came upon exactly what he wanted, a neat, little cottage sitting back from the road a bit, and looking very homelike and hospitable. His rap at the door was answered by a good-looking, middle-aged Madame to whom he explained the circumstances of his plight, and of whom he begged the favor of shelter for the night.

"Certainement, Monsieur," she replied, ushering him into a plain, little living room. "You have walked a long way, and you are tired. It is only right that you have rest and sleep."

"But where is the Monsieur?" asked Hampton, gazing curiously about the room.

The Madame explained that her husband had gone on a journey from which he had yet to return.

"But what does it matter?" she asked naively. "Monsieur, the Englishman, is most welcome nevertheless."

She conducted him to the room he was to occupy, and explained that inasmuch as it led from the room in which she herself slept, it might be well were he to retire first.

And in the morning, she said, "do not rise until six, please. For then I, too, shall have risen, and you may pass through my chamber without fear of embarrassment."

Hampton thanked her profusely and retired. Being weary from his long walk, he slept soundly and awoke in the morning feeling much refreshed. He wondered, while dressing, if the Monsieur had returned home during the night, but assumed that he had. Then glancing at his wrist watch, he saw that the time was many minutes past six. Doubtless Monsieur and Madame were up and waiting breakfast for him. He opened the door of his room and stepped boldly into the adjoining chamber.

Mon Dieu! Surely, there was some mistake! There was no Monsieur to be seen, but the Madame was very much in evidence. She had not yet risen, much less left the room! In fact, she was reclining upon the bed in voluptuous abandon, apparently sound asleep. As the night had been warm, she had neglected to wear the usual sleeping garment, and allowed the single coverlet to slip to the floor!

Hampton gasped as he glimpsed her unobscured charms so temptingly disclosed, and would have stumbled back through the doorway had the door opened his eyes at that moment and been looking at her.

"What, Monsieur?" he exclaimed, staring up with flushed cheeks and bright eyes.

"A thousand pardons!" he stammered. "As it is past ten, I assumed that Madame would be in the living room, and I should not have entered here."

"Ah!" she said softly. "It is the big mistake. I forgot to inform Monsieur that I have the habit of sleeping here. But what does it matter, Monsieur?"

"Er—it is nothing, I suppose," stammered Hampton, "unless, perhaps, my untimely intrusion has been embarrassing for Madame."

Her smile broadened; her bright eyes grew warm and glowing. Slowly rising to a sitting posture, she slid long, bare legs over the edge of the bed, and sat for a moment vacantly regarding him. Then she rose and moved forward.

"It is nothing," she murmured in low tones. "For last night, I dreamed of the good-looking Monsieur, and there were no doors between us!"

Hampton coughed and dropped his gaze. "But the Monsieur, Madame's husband, did he not return in the night?"

"No, my friend," she answered. "Several months ago he went on a journey, and I did not expect him to

MAD, BAD, BABY

By Eldon Lynch

The Story So Far:

Julie Rose, a little dancer known as "Broadway Baby," bitterly resents it when Dad Kinnev, her platonic "sugar daddy" pays attention to another woman. To make him jealous she asks Philip Elliot, a prominent artist, to make love to her before Dad. He does so, but Dad seems not to care, so Julie desperately suggests that Philip and she marry. After a hasty marriage she telephones Dad, but instead of being enraged or jealous he congratulates her! Julie is heartbroken and dazedly consents to accompany her unwanted husband on a "business" trip to Boston, by boat.

By accident she finds three paintings of a nude woman in Philip's studio, and, shortly afterward, sees him walking the deck with the woman who posed for the pictures!

She believes he planned to ruin her on the boat.

After Julie has gone to bed she is awakened by a searchlight shining in her face. A strange man, muttering something about the "skunkies," is entranced by her beauty and makes love to her. Seemingly hypnotized by his caresses, she makes no resistance and is horrified to find herself responding. . . .

He suspects her husband is lying, knowing her reputation.

(Turn over)

SUDDENLY the lights were switched on and the next moment the man beside her was wrenched violently away. Still lethargic from the unknown intruder's sensuous love-making, Julie glanced up and saw Philip, white with anger, deal a blow that sent the white-haired man reeling. There was no fight, not even a quarrel. The intruder skulked silently away, nursing his cheek, and Philip locked the door behind him.

"So he's got you, too, has he?" he asked of the bewildered girl. Then, as she only stared, puzzled, he laughed harshly. "Or is he another 'platonic' friend, like Dad?"

"Why I never saw this man before!" she exclaimed, outraged. "I was asleep to-night when he came in. I heard him say something about some sketches. He never even knew I was here until I sort of screamed a little. Then, he seemed to forget what he'd come for. He—well, he kissed me and, I don't know, I just felt too weak to call out . . ."

"Don't you know that that is Old Fascination, who insists on being able to 'get' any woman he wants?"

Digust could live at this startling information. She had heard plenty about the man whom the show girls all called "Old Fascination." Many times she had listened respectfully to their vivid stories of the old man's amazing conquests of his strange and unfailing power. Now she shuddered, filled with horror at her own weakness. She should have killed the loathsome creature! He was, undoubtedly, taking advantage of a foolish superstition that some silly woman had started. Strange power indeed! She almost wished for another chance in which to prove what little power he had over her, at least. There was no doubt that the man knew how to love, how to please a woman's senses. He could, she thought, make surrender a very pleasant thing, but to make it an inevitable and certain thing—that she did not believe. It amused her to learn that Philip believed in it.

"His wife is on board, too," he went on, merrily. "She's very beautiful and he's terribly jealous of her."

Julie began to understand. That tawny-haired woman, then, was Old Fascination's wife, and he was jealous of her! He had entered the show-room to-night in search of those sketches of her! And after he got them, then what? Would he be satisfied to destroy them? Or would that one wickedly smiling painting make him want to avenge himself on the man who had painted it? Julie was uneasy. Not that it mattered what happened to Philip, but murder is a very messy business, whatever the victim is.

"Well, run back to your deck chair," she said, suddenly conscious of her disheveled self, "I must get some beauty sleep."

"You don't look as though you needed much," he remarked, unable to take his eyes from the delectable picture she presented, "and I'm not going to run along. You're my wife, and as long as there are men like that

She, too, closed her eyes.

The guttural, eerie sound of a fog horn awakened her. She couldn't have slept long, because it was still dark outside, but in the short time she had slept a storm had blown up. She could hear the patter and swish of rain on the deck outside, and the boat itself pitched and tossed fright-ed feel, I intend to stay here and protect you."

Their eyes met, locked, hers defiant, his burningly triumphant. At last she turned away, pulled the covers up to her shoulders and mumbled a grudging "good-night." After a brief silence she heard little sounds that indicated he was nodding. A few moments afterward he dozed off upon the cot berth. He remained quiet and motionless for so long that she surmised he had gone to sleep truly. The movements he made now and then began to wonder if there was any danger.

Well, night is well nigh, she knew she couldn't sleep while her hair rippled like that. She pulled on the bed-light, leaned over the edge of the bed to reach for a comb. The hair, suddenly rising, slipped so low that she had her fingers and was trapped on the floor. Before she could rise, a big young man from the top berth and Philip jumped down.

(then more)

He cradled her slight form in his arms, his eyes fixed anxiously upon her. "Not hurt, are you, dear?" he questioned.

"No. Put me down, please."

He reluctantly placed her in the berth, then sighed loudly. "Lord, I don't know which are most becoming to you, rompers, or pajamas!" he said, smiling down at her.

She continued to stare at him stonily, and, after a moment, he leaned over, buried his head in the lace at her breast. "Julie!" he whispered unsteadily, his hands on her shoulders, "Julie, why are you so mean to me? Don't you like me at all!"

"No, I don't. You have no strange power over women!" she replied mockingly.

"But you have over men!" he cried, his lips burning through the silk of her blouse. "Julie, Julie, I want you, so badly!" His eyes begged, implored her.

"How much longer must I endure this?" she inquired acidly. How dared he act like that? The memory of those paintings in his suitcase seared her with all their hateful implications. "If you persist in behaving so abominably, I'll take a deck chair!"

"Wrong. You are going to stay right here with me where you belong. I married you because of a foolish whim that you had, but that was before I knew how desire could torture a man. I'd do anything for you, you know I would! Why can't you help me? Let me hold you, kiss you, at least." Then, as she remained cold and silent, he gripped her shoulders hard. His breath came jerkily. The veins in his forehead showed, blue, trembling. He bit his lips in a struggle for control.

Angered at his clutch upon her shoulders, she twisted sharply about. Her movement loosened the slender ribbon straps of her pajama blouse. Hastily she endeavored to replace the severed garment, but he held her arms down, his eyes frankly feasting upon the beauty thus uncovered. With an incoherent, pained cry he swept her hungrily to his breast, bending her head far back with the fierceness of his kisses. When the torment upon him had been somewhat appeased, he allowed her to sink back, exhausted, on the pillow.

"Don't be too angry, my dearest," he whispered and, with a lingering glance at her, he reluctantly climbed up into the top berth.

For a long, long time, she lay motionless in the dark, living over and over again those mad, passionate moments when Philip's lips had claimed and possessed hers. Useless to deny that his touch had thrilled her as she had never known a woman could be No second-hand love for her, thank you! She regretted having allowed him a single kiss.

Sleep was impossible after that for her, though the deep, measured breathing of her husband assured her that he, at least had fallen asleep. She lay and watched dawn creep through the shuttered window.

Stealthy footsteps in the corridor caused her to sit up, alert and listening. In the dimness she saw a white square slide under the door. A letter, apparently! She waited, while the soft footfalls died away, then, noiselessly she rose, stole across the room and took the envelope. It was not sealed, and, regardless of the name "Philip Eliot," scrawled across the message, she opened it, praying that he would not awake. There was just

During the pauses of rain or my fuddled will tell us.

In less than an hour, the ship would dock at Buenos Aires, without a doubt. Old Fascination would search for the paintings as soon as they landed. There was no time to waste. She hated her husband, so she told herself very vehemently several times, but she couldn't stand by and see him murdered in cold blood.

He chuckled but did not turn, and very quickly she re-arranged the contents of her suitcase and softly closed it. Then she dressed.

"We dock soon, better hurry," she said briefly and went out on deck.

"If I find he's painted a picture of you, I'll kill him," her husband yelled.

Tearing the letter in tiny bits she tucked the pieces away in a pocket of her suitcase, and then, keeping one eye upon the sleeping man in the top berth, she opened his suitcase and examined the rolled drawings. Hastily she unwrapped them, placed them in her own suitcase and then wrapped the paper around a magazine, so that, if Philip looked, he would think the paintings were still there.

"Not up already, Julia?" Philip's voice droned loudly.

"Yes—Pm dressing. Don't look!" she answered in a whisper, despite the fact she could not be questioned.

There was no sign of Old Fascination or his beautiful wife and she was rather relieved. She sat alone on a small folding chair, her troubled eyes fixed unsmiling on the water below. When they began to near the dock, she rose and went back to the stateroom.

Philip was just leaving, carrying both suitcases, but she insisted upon having her own and, surprised and not a little displeased, he finally surrendered it.

There was a large crowd below, waiting for the gang plank to be lowered, but nowhere could she see the two people she hated. Filling up the plank, sometimes large however

A Pen and Ink Sketch Symbolizing Desire

The Bird In The Jilted Cage

J. TORRINGTON SMELL was not a miser, but he had spent a goodly portion of his two-score years in either falling or being thrown over. He had been falling for quite ten fifteen years, and fourteen years had been spent in being thrown over by the girls he fell for. Now the composer of three successful musical comedies in collaboration with his friend Kelsey Hammond, he found himself once more left in the lurch.

Peggy Black was the offender this time. Peggy Black, the diminutive and peppy star of the first two South-Hammond musical shows. J. Torrington had actually managed to stay on aged to Peggy for three consecutive months, but at the last moment she had packed up and eloped with an Argentine beef baron and gone off to live in a South American castle, leaving her fiancé and his new show in an embarrassing predicament.

"Oh, it's terrible!" J. Torrington groaned when Kelsey Hammond, with whom he shared a luxurious Park Avenue apartment, brought the news.

Kelsey grinned. "You got all the best of it, my lad!" he stated with conviction. "You're lucky and don't know it."

"But, Kelsey, I loved the girl!"

"A man's a fool to fall for some nitwit dame and let her get him all good-natured. No, I hate the sight of the creature!"

"But you don't know what real love is, Kelsey!"

Smell sat down at the piano grand and strummed the keys reflectively, producing soft and melancholy chords. "It's beyond me how you, a woman-hater, can write such soul-stirring love lyrics," he said.

Kelsey grinned. "Oh, it's easy. I just close my eyes and say to myself 'Well, what would you write if you were damned fool enough to be in love?' Then whatever I write, well, there I am."

Smell sighed momentarily. "Well, I guess Peggy is well on her way to South America by this time."

Hammond stirred. "Yarl! We've gotta get up a new soprano for the rehearsal. Here, let's see, somebody was telling me about a young dame with a good voice and not much experience. She might take the job during rehearsal until Katz and Kohn sign up some other star for us. Can't hold up the rest of the cast just because one dame decides to take a run-out powder. Oh, here's the address, over on Sixth Avenue. Take a run up that way, won't you, and look this chicken up!"

(turn him)

Smell took the slip of paper.

It was a shabby-looking brick dwelling which bore the number corresponding to that on the slip which J. Tarrington Smell consulted. He mounted the worn stone steps and pulled an old fashioned bell-handle.

A slatternly woman opened the door. J. Tarrington doffed his hat, glanced at his memorandum again, and, clearing his voice, politely inquired "Is this where Miss Donna Hissup lives?"

The woman regarded him with apparent suspicion. "What do you want?"

"I heard she was looking for an engagement, and—"

His grim-visaged interlocutor relented a little. "Oh," she said, opening the door a little wider. "A job for her, eh? Well, you can come in. It's time she was landin' someplace. She owes two weeks' board bill. Go right upstairs. She's on the third floor back. Go right up."

As he mounted the first flight of stairs, he heard a voice pure and melodious emanating from the regions above. When he reached the room from which the singing came, entranced by the voice, he forgot the formality of knocking. Grasping the door-knob impatiently, he turned it and shoved. J. Tarrington stumbled awkwardly into the room and was met by a horrified shriek of dismay.

He raised his eyes and beheld a very beautiful and very nude young woman!

He staggered back, his eyes roving the tiny room as though seeking escape. Why, it was a bathroom and this young woman was just stepping out of the tub when he opened the door!

"I beg your pardon!" he gulped and stammered dismally.

The girl threw a bath-towel about her, it covered her most incompletely, and glared through her blazes. "How dare you!" she stormed. "Didn't you hear me singing?" she demanded.

"Yes," he repeated. "I heard you. That's why I came in."

"Well, when you live in a place like this, singing means to stay out. That's why I was singing because there wasn't any lock on the bathroom door."

He managed to open the door in the confusion. "I'm sorry!" he pleaded. "I didn't realize—"

She shoved him out and slammed the door after him. "The ideal!" she snarled.

He ventured to tap on the closed portal. "I beg your pardon, but I'm looking for someone," he protested feebly.

"Well, look some other place. I want to come out of here and I haven't my bathrobe."

"But—but can you tell me where to look?" he persisted.

"Where to look for what?"

"Who for Miss Donna Hissup."

"What are you, a bill-collector?"

"No. I want to see her about a singing position. Do you know her?"

"Know her?" the voice was no longer fretful. "I am here! A singing position, did I hear you say, or are my ears deceiving me?"

"You are Donna Hissup, then? Oh, I was sure of it when I heard your voice!" And absent-mindedly, J. Torrington Smell opened the bathroom door again.

There came another shriek and then something warm and wet, something that felt like a bath towel was flung over his uncovered head, masking his face and eyes. Something soft and yielding bumped into him. He reeled, and felt a perfumed presence run past him with a little excited gig-

"Oh, Kelsey! She's the most wonderful, stunning, ravishing creature."

Hammond peered at J. Torrington Smell quizzically. "My lord, have you fallen again?"

Smell explained blushing. "And—and she's going to have dinner with me tonight!"

"Where?"

"Here."

"Oh, hell! That means I've gotta

gle. By the time he had untangled himself from the bath towel and blinked his eyes, the bathroom door was open and he was alone in the hall.

A soft voice called to him from behind a door a little further up the hall. "If you won't be so impatient, I'll put on some clothes and we can look like civilized human beings instead of naked savages."

"No savage would sing like that," J. Torrington protested.

"Well, did you find her?" Kelsey Hammond looked up as his co-worker entered the apartment a bit later go out! Damn women, anyhow."

But J. Torrington didn't hear him. He was busy at the piano composing a new love-song.

Later that evening, Hammond, pausing before he went out, shook an admonitory finger at his partner. "Remember what Peggy did to you!" he said in warning tones. "Don't go putting your face into another mess like that!"

"The trouble with you," said Kelsey Hammond to J. Torrington Smell some short breakfast coffee three weeks later, "is that you're too slow. You don't know an opportunity

(turn over)

when you see one, and even if you recognized it you'd be too dumb to take advantage of it."

"What do you mean?" asked J. Torrington.

"I'm talking about this Hissop female. You're crazy about her, aren't you?"

Smell shook his head. "I've sent her flowers and candy and raised her pay and promised her the understudy role in the show and she just smiles at me and says 'Thank you' and that's all I get."

"Listen, kid! You know that dame's got a voice and lots of it—she could hold down the lead herself and get away with it like a million bucks, and you know it. What's the answer?"

"I don't know. What is the answer?"

"You boob! Arrange for her to get the lead part—on condition, see?"

"Oh, I couldn't do that!"

"Why not? It's being done every day. They like it, I tell you! Fair exchange is no robbery."

"But how could I go about it?"

"Oh, that's a mere detail!" Hammond said with an airy wave of his hand. "Leave everything to me, kid!"

So J. Torrington Smell left everything to Kelsey Hammond, and two nights later the stage was set. Donna Hissup was invited up to their apartment to go over certain interpolations in the score of the show, and, incidentally, for a snack of supper.

When she arrived, J. Torrington was alone. "Where is Mr. Hammond?" she asked as he awkwardly helped her to remove her evening wrap.

"He, he had to go out," her vis-à-vis explained with a flush. "You'll stay for a bite anyhow, won't you?"

They ate, and retired to the comfortable living room. Smell sat at the piano, and for twenty or thirty minutes they devoted themselves to the music under discussion. Then Smell swung about.

"Miss Hissup, Donna, how would you like to have the lead in our show instead of just the understudy part?"

"You mean I'm to be the leading lady?" she gasped unbelievably.

he asked.

She rose from where she sat, her breath coming in sharp gasps. "The—the lead?" she said in unbelieving amazement.

He nodded.

"But, you're joking?"

"I'm not! Here is the contract, see?" He showed her the ready-prepared form that represented everything she had dreamed of for years.

She sank down on a chair, limply. "Oh, it can't be true!" she said slowly.

"But it is!" he said. And then he did a curious thing. He took the contract and its duplicate and deliberately strode over to the wall-safe at one side of the room, opened it, and carefully placed the papers within its steel confines. He set a hand and twirled a dial. The door snicked shut.

She looked at him curiously. "Why did you do that?"

He blushed heavily and his voice squeaked as he answered. "That's a time-lock safe," he told her, "and it's set for seven tomorrow morning. It can't be opened until then."

She stared at him questioningly.

He tried to explain. "The contract is yours, when the safe opens, if you'll wait for it."

Understanding came to her suddenly. She rose to unsteady feet. "I'll take my wrap, please!" she said.

He was taken aback. The thing wasn't going according to Hammond's premeditated plot at all! She was turning him down!

As the bath towel struck him, a perfumed presence swept past him with a giggle.

It was nine the next morning when Kelsey Hammond returned to the apartment. J. Torrington Smell was dressed; there were blue circles under his bespectacled eyes. Donna Hissup was gone, the wall-safe was open, and the signed duplicate was on the table.

"Did it work, old timer?" Kelsey asked jovially.

"She left at seven-thirty this morning with the contract," Smell answered.

"Atta baby! Old Don Juan himself!" And Kelsey Hammond smote his partner a mighty thwack on the back.

Partly thirty days from that morning, with Donna Hissup a snarling buckaroo in the Smell Hammond musical hit, Kelsey Hammond looked keenly at his partner over

TROPICAL LURE!

By Malcolm MacGregor

Slowly her body began to sway to the wild tune on the phonograph.

IT WAS Marcea, the golden skinned, black haired, petite half-caste girl, who had prevented Tuan Jim Holiday from visiting the meager civilization of Moari for more than six months. Now as his schooner came in out of the coral sea and anchored at the cove of Moari, his first thoughts were of her. The thoughts were pleasant memories of the past mixed with a certain dread of the future.

That first time he set foot on Moari, the half caste Polynesian had given herself to him as completely and unreservedly as only such a girl will bestow her affections on anyone who really touches her heart. Because he was handsome and found that she was the answer to all his desires. Then Jim had taken all she so willingly offered.

(turn over)

But Tuan Jim was new to the tropics; thus and had heard strange tales of what happened to white men who took natives or half castes for mistresses, and had run away even when he wanted to stay. He had also heard how fickle is the affection of a half caste, and since an unpleasant affair with a woman in the States had driven him to the South Seas, he was not anxious to have it repeated. He had come to love Maori greatly and had postponed his visit to Meari because he feared a meeting with her would cause him to weaken. His business for his sugar plantation, a small island several hundred miles from Meari, had made it necessary for him to return.

As soon as his boat anchored, he hurried up the beach to the one house Maori had to offer. Two men and two women were seated on the veranda, and although he knew only two of the men, he nodded pleasantly to the trio. When he entered the house he heard a whispered conversation ending about and felt certain his affair with Maori was the topic of it.

It was not until dinner that he met the woman. She was young and quite pretty, with a mysterious twinkle in her dark eyes that should not have been there. She was introduced to him as Betty Betts, wife of the new missionary to the Meari district. At that moment, her husband was carrying on a religious campaign among natives in a group of small some distance from Meari. He had feared the heat would be too intense for his wife to accompany him, and had left her in the nearest civilization of Meari.

Tuan Jim found her quite interesting, and long after dinner was over sat on the mosquito-netted veranda alone with her. For one so young, and particularly as the wife of an island missionary, she seemed to know much of life and possessed a great love for it.

"I hear you are the one white man who has been able to resist the lure of native and half-caste girls," she said suddenly.

Tuan Jim looked at her with surprise for a moment; then, with a smile he admitted that affairs with native girls were not included in his weaknesses.

"Then you haven't met Pepeta, have you?" asked the woman.

"I don't think I ever heard of her," admitted Tuan Jim.

"Then you should know her before you pass judgment on half-caste girls. Pepeta is the embodiment of all love and passion, and worldly enjoyments."

"Hasn't your husband tried to convert her?"

"I'm afraid my husband has reached the point where he is ready to admit he can never do anything for her. You should meet her sometime."

"Thanks, but I am quite content without her acquaintance."

"But she is very beautiful, especially in the moonlight. Her hair is long and jet black, her eyes are large and dark and one look from them is enough to make any man forget himself. To see her strolling along the beach beneath the trees at night makes one think of Diana. I always feel that men are the object of her hunt."

Tuan Jim thought it rather strange conversation for the wife of a missionary, but he had seen before strange emotions brought to the surface by the tropic moon. He made no comment, and a short time later, after a promise to take Betty Bettison for an inspection of his schooner next day, retired to his room.

He had been in his room only a short time, writing several letters he intended to mail the next day, when he heard a faint rattling at the bamboo screen over the window that led out into the garden. Looking up he saw a dainty, tapering leg, with a small leis encircling the ankle, project its way over the sill.

The leg was so pretty, with its golden hue made all the more sensuous in the moonlight, that he watched eagerly as another leg came over the window sill to join it. Dimpled knees came next into view, then well moulded thighs. He expected to see a naked girl enter the room from behind the bamboo screen, but as the body came further into view he saw that a gaudy sash had been tied about her hips, with a great knot in front. Then, with a sudden bound, the girl leaped into the room, and he saw that the sash was her only article of clothing, except his about the neck and wrists and lotus blossoms in her hair.

For a moment Tuan Jim had feared it was Mareta, for he knew she would recognize his schooner in the harbor and would come hunting for him. But instead it was a stranger who faced him with a flashing smile of pearly teeth. The girl stood just inside the window, her smile becoming more sensuous as her great dark eyes surveyed his athletic body.

"Good evening, Mistaire Man," she said slowly in a droning voice that was almost a caress.

"Who are you?" demanded Tuan Jim.

"I am Pepeta, the desire of all men. And I have come to see Mistaire Tuan Jeem."

"I am Tuan Jim Holiday. What do you wish?"

"Ah, Mistaire Tuan Jeem. Man do not talk so to Pepeta. Ah, no, never! And especially, Mistaire Tuan Jeem, when I have come to dance for him."

"I'm afraid you have made a mistake, girl. I don't even know you."

"Ah, no, but before morning Mistaire Tuan Jeem will know Pepeta very well and will want her to come back always to dance for him and love him!"

Before Tuan Jim could say anything further, the girl walked across the room, turned on the phonograph, then glided to the center of the room. It was a tango and not the sobbing notes of a South Sea number that came from the battered machine, but it seemed the sort of wild music that suited the girl.

For several tense moments she stood with one hand on her hip and her head thrown back as she listened to the music, then slowly her body started to sway as she began a dance of her own conception. It was a weird, sensuous thing that called to all that was wild in Tuan Jim, and he felt himself growing weak as he watched her.

As the Phidias gods put their dances all their desires, so did the girl, and Tuan Jim felt the blood pounding at his temples with the same great desire. Each move of the girl made him want to crush her in his arms so tightly it would hurt her, yet he wanted to caress her bare shoulders tenderly; he wanted to kiss her lips more voluptuously than he had ever kissed anyone, and wanted her to be passive in his arms. It was not love, but carnal desire. He knew now why white men went mad over half-caste girls, and felt that it must have been real love he possessed for Mareta because she had only called to the tender romantic in him.

But he was not thinking of Mareta or anyone else as he watched the sway of Pepeta's hips, the flash of her dark eyes as she let him know she found him desirable, her bare breasts that seemed polished gold in the pale light of the two oil lamps and fired his blood, and the appeal of her extended arms.

Before the dance had been completed, he leaped suddenly to his feet and gathered her tightly in his arms. Pepeta went willingly to him and held her lips ready to meet his. It was such a kiss as he had never before known. It was the answer to all passion, yet the key to more. With his lips pressed tightly to her he lifted her bodily from the floor and carried her to the bed.

As he dropped down on the bed beside her, Pepeta began running her fingers through his hair and caressing his cheeks as she murmured soft little words of endearment and offered no objections to the liberties he took with his hands. Every few moments she looked over and gave him another of those strange kisses while he pressed her body close to his men.

Each time brought the blood pounding more loudly at his temples and called to all that his body had suggested for so long. When he could resist no longer, he flung her back upon the bed where he lay for days for several moments while he fastened his eyes upon her enchanting body. Then, with a wild cry that came from a knowledge that he possessed her for the purpose at hand, he kissed her lips, her eyes, her bare shoulders and breasts. When his hand reached down to embrace the knee that held the skin about her hips, she placed her hand restrainingly over his.

"Marva, Tuan Joo will turn out the lights first, no?" she asked.

Assured that a girl like Tepita should make that request, Tuan Joo arose from the bed and started to-

"Tuan Joo has he her desire here, no?" she asked.

"Marva," asked Tuan Joo.

LELAND Hannum's arms tightened about Nan's slender shoulders. Slowly his lips touched hers. She had been struggling, but now delightfully she relaxed.

The little mandarin clock on the mantelpiece tinkled musically. Nan sat up straight at the sound. With a soft exclamation she pushed Leland from her and jumped to her feet.

"Look, Lee, at the time! We're mad! Jack may come in at any moment. He mustn't find us here like this." She rushed to the mirror and with little feminine pats and pulls smoothed her tumbled golden curls and her charming teagown of peachfulsome.

"Isn't it cute?" asked Tim. "Jack brought it in the other day. Something fantastically unusual about it, don't you think? I'm crazy about him."

Leland lighted his cigarette thoughtfully. Then he smiled strangely and said:

"Yes, there is a grinnogude about thing."

Leland was gone. Nan sat in the chair, near the huge center table, staring with wide startled eyes at the china cat. Its eyes seemed more sinister, more questioning than ever.

She straightened as her husband came into the room. He walked to her side, and she saw that he was in good humor.

"Home so soon?" she said slowly. "I hadn't expected you for hours yet."

Jack Purze smiled. He was slightly inclined toward stoutness, and his small eyes, which usually seemed to glitter, were quite passive now.

"Rushed back," he said in his thick peculiar tone. "Meeting went along a little faster than I had expected. How about the 'Polliet' tonight?"

"Splendid," she replied. "A little music would be pleasant."

He leaned over, kissed her upon the forehead.

"I'll run along and phone for tickets," he said and left the room.

Nan listened to his foot-falls as he went up the stairs to his room. Again her eyes rested upon the grinning staring eyes of the cat.

Opening her left hand, she slowly untwisted the bit of white paper which Leland Harnum had crumpled upon. Again she read:

"Telephone to the car. When under wraps in another room. Jack's probably leaving in. Kiss me just viciously when I make love and then meet me downstairs at the Club Lido at eight. How's that for cat's paw?"

Nan smiled a mischievous happy smile. She rose and walked to the fireplace. As the time passed, she glanced again at the china cat.

Its eyes were still glittering wickedly, was such a queer thing!

woman. I have been true to Tuan Jim, but white woman has not been true to her man. Look!"

Before Tuan Jim realized what she was about, Mareea ran across the room to the bed where Pepeta lay watching her with frightened eyes. With a quick movement, Mareea grasped the sash about the other girl's hips and snatched it off.

As Tuan Jim looked, he saw that the flesh the sash had covered was white. Pepeta was a white woman!

"Don't you know her, Tuan Jim?" demanded Mareea. "It is the wife of the missionary, who at night when her husband is away stains her body and becomes Pepeta. In the day she has all men's respect, and at night selects her lovers. But Mareea has always remained true to Tuan Jim."

As Tuan Jim stood looking at the two women, one who had fought for his love and the other for his passion, the girl who had been Pepeta quickly picked up the sash, and wrapping it hurriedly about her hips, fled from the room through the same window she had entered.

For several long moments after she had gone, Tuan Jim sat in a chair watching the window where she had disappeared. Then Mareea walked slowly over and knelt down beside him, taking one of his hands in both her own.

"Will Tuan Jim now be afraid to take Mareea on to his island to live with him and love him always?" she asked.

"We'll go back in the morning, Mareea," replied Tuan Jim, and stooping down he lifted Mareea to him.

her watchful eyes caught a glimpse of snowy hair. Old Fascination was waiting.

No sooner had they landed than two huge men seized Philip and held him while Old Fascination opened the suitcase and hurriedly pawed over its contents. It was all done so swiftly, so quietly that few people noticed anything out of the ordinary. Philip, seeing the impossibility of breaking away from the brutes that held him, did not struggle, made no outcry. But his face whitened and took on such a tense, strained expression that Julie longed to run to him, to tell him not to worry.

Old Fascination's wife leaned against the wall, weak and trembling, her big black eyes darting feverishly about as though seeking a place in which to hide. Julie was feminine enough to feel no sympathy for her, the woman whom her husband loved!

"So! You would lie to me, would you?" the old man exulted softly, putting up the rolled package and fingering it lovingly, gloatingly. "Expected me to believe that there never had been any paintings of you, did you?" His sharp, cruel eyes held his wife's frightened ones while he slowly untied the string. "Remember what I told you would happen to both you and the man who dared paint you? Ah yes, I see that you do recall! And you know that I always keep my word!" He tore off the paper, his mouth suddenly grim, unyielding. A gaudily covered magazine fell to the floor!

A silly, sheepish expression on his florid face, he snatched it up, leafed hurriedly through it; then, thoroughly disgusted, he flung it down again.

The Greatest Sin

Must every woman pay the price of a moment's happiness in bitter tears and years of regret? Must millions of homes be ruined—lovers and sweethearts driven apart—marriages totter to the brink of divorce—the sacred joys of sex relations be denied? YES—Just as long as men and women remain ignorant of the simple facts of life.

The Greatest Sin of all is total IGNORANCE of the most important subject in the life of every man and woman—SEX.

AWAY WITH FALSE MODESTY!

Let us face the facts of sex fearlessly and frankly, sincerely and scientifically. Let us tear the veil of shame and mystery from sex and build the future of the race on a new knowledge of all the facts of sex as they are laid bare in plain, daring but wholesome words, and frank pictures in the huge new library of Sex Knowledge.

"MODERN EUGENICS"

20 Chapters—Starling Illustrations.

This volume abounds in truthful illustrations and pictures of scientific interest that one seldom, if ever, finds outside of the highly technical medical books which laymen fail to understand. Every picture is true to life.

Oh, boy, I am tickled skinny to either. It is the greatest improvement in writing instruments since the fountain pen received their thoughts on clay to make a triangular pointed rod. John B. Atwell,

THE NEW IMPROVED

INKOGRAPH
"PENCIL POINTED PEN"

Combines the best Features of both pen and pencil, minus the weak points of both, plus improvements not found in either.

A Pen of Refinement

Made of finest quality, highly polished, black fountain pen material, with 14-Kt. solid gold point and feed, safety screw cap, self-filling lever and clip. Equal in workmanship, quality and appearance to pens costing considerably more.

Cannot Leak

One filling is sufficient to write thousands of words.

ALSO made in very attractive $3.00 styles, red, black or met-hard rubber with 14 Kt. gold filled band and clip on cap, and self-filling lever. Same size as $7 and $8.75 fountain pen.
Colors and trimmings in ladies' size. All $2.00 styles are black with nickel clip and self-filling lever. Prices outside U.S.A. $2.50 styles $2.50, $3.00 styles $4.00. Remittance must accompany order.
